

Sarah Wiora received her bachelor's degree in English from Governors State University. She is currently a graduate student studying English at Governors State University, and writing her thesis on the benefits of expressive writing as a method of processing trauma. In her time at Governors State University, Sarah has worked as a Supplemental Instructor for Environmental Biology, a Writing Fellow, and as the Graduate Assistant to the First-year Writing Program. Sarah believes in the importance of helping students gain confidence in their ability as well as improving their writing skills through positive feedback and encouragement. In helping students build confidence in their own abilities, Sarah hopes to help them succeed not only in the immediate classroom, but in their long-term educational and career goals, as well.

Sarah will be teaching SAT Prep for Essay Writing and Language. The classes will begin with a practice exam in order to assess student strengths and weaknesses, which will then be addressed throughout the semester in order to help students prepare for the test. Sample questions and practice essays will be interwoven throughout the class in order to continually keep track of student progress and understanding, and a final practice test will be administered at the end of the semester.
